Thailand Snake Photos — Green Pit Viper

White Lipped Green Pit Viper in Thailand - I think.

A reader, Jeremy Gatten, sent this photo (used with permission) of a green pit viper he found one night while looking for owls near Wat Tham Pha Plong near Chiang Dao in Thailand's north. I was thinking it was. He had squatted down to rest and heard a little rustle in the brush — and found this amazing specimen of… well, pit viper. I don't know which one it is — but, I'm guessing it's the White Lipped Pit Viper.

Jeremy himself narrowed it down to one of two — either Trimeresurus macrops or Trimeresurus albolabris (White Lipped Pit Viper).

What do you think?

Note — do be very careful not to be bitten by any of the green pit vipers, their venom — while not usually deadly — is quite strong and can cause havoc in the human body. Vipers are typically identified (in general) by their small size (< 1 meter) and the triangle shaped head.
